Abstract—E-learning is increasingly used to support learning in various educational institutions. From the perspective of information system, e-learning is included as non-functional component of transactional processing system. However, e-learning contains a lot of knowledge that needs to be managed in order to make it into the strategic level. This study aims to identify all possible knowledge contained in e-learning and analyze e-learning modules and features needed to manage the knowledge. Qualitative approach is used to perform an in-depth inductive study of the five experts' interview results. The result shows 14 e-learning knowledge related to 5 modules. These 14 knowledge could be used as base to the development of 31 new features to be implemented in e-learning system, at the same time transform it into knowledge-based e-learning system. The number is not limited only to this result, considering there might be any other knowledge obtained from different expert perspectives. This study can be used as a reference in the development of e-learning system as well as in the more detailed future research on knowledge management adoption in e-learning.

I. INTRODUCTION

E-learning is a learning methodology facilitated and supported through the use of information and communication technologies (ICT) [1]. It is an application of internet-based technology such as intranet, extranet and internet to support teaching and learning process in educational environment and institutions [2]. E-learning involves the use of internet technology to provide education where teacher and students are geographically dispersed and distant [3]. The objectives of e-learning are to make knowledge assets access easy and offer education for all, enhancing learning experiences using ICT, improving the learning platform, archive learning resources, managing all types of knowledge, and facilitate searching [4]. E-learning is not limited only for formal education purposes, but also all field that use learning as part of the system. In practical way, e-learning is done through technology called Learning Management System (LMS). Figure 1 shows e-learning position from the perspective of information system pyramid model [5]. From that perspective, e-learning in Indonesian higher education is still in transactional level, and negligible in management and strategic level. This is represented in e-learning tools such as Moodle which is only used to put learning material online, conduct online quizzes and exams, and give assignments.

Knowledge should be distinguished with data and information. Data is a set of facts, perceptions, observation; information is data that possess context, relevance, and purpose; while knowledge is the justified beliefs about relationships among concepts relevant to that particular area [6] [7]. Based on the definition, knowledge could be seen as information that enables action and decisions or information with direction [6].

Knowledge Management (KM) is doing what is needed to get the most out of knowledge resources [6]. It is a management tool which justify belief that knowledge become asset to increase organizational capacity so that organizational can be more effective [8]. The objective of KM is to improve the quality of the contributions people make to their organizations by helping people to make sense of the context within which the organization exists, to take responsibility, to cooperate and share they know and learn, and to effectively challenge, negotiate and learn from others [9]. The tasks involved in KM consist of creating, manipulating, and managing all types of knowledge; sharing, disseminating, and reusing knowledge; and foster innovation by free access to knowledge and enhance the performance of human resources [4].

KM and e-learning are recognized as self-contained disciplines for years. E-learning is rooted in psychology, didactic and pedagogy, which structured and personal guidance are emphasized. However, KM focuses on organization's memory or knowledge base, where individual's knowledge must be transferred and made explicit [9].

KM-oriented e-learning has become the effective tool that transforms tacit knowledge into explicit knowledge. As a result, organizations with this system can accomplish knowledge and information delivery in or between organizations [10]. KM and e-learning are closely related because e-learning users need a suitable KM tools that can help them to obtain the kind of content they need, together with as correct and complete information as possible [11]. In this study, the integration of KM into e-learning system called knowledge-based e-learning system.

Based on the background above, it seems quite important to make one step forward in finding how KM could improve e-learning. Most studies discuss the effect of e-learning on KM in an organization. E-learning is seen as a support for
