Since the undersigned were members of the Operations Research Group U S Navy it is perhaps not surprising that the examples given are drawn chiefly from the work of this group though an effort has been made to include examples from the work of other groups. Many persons have helped by discussions and editorial criticism including members of other operations groups in this country and in England. To mention a few would slight many others so none is named. During the war the scope, methods and triumphs of operations research were not appreciated by most scientists or by most military men because no information was freely available. If we are not to lose this valuable experience and background some of it must be made available to the scientists and engineers as well as to the armed services. This is particularly important if the methods of operations research have important peacetime applications as it is believed they do. The first publication of this work as in classified form just after World War II. To further the purposes mentioned in the preceding paragraph hereafter the 1 volume has now been declassified after suitable modification of a few examples. The first and last chapters have been entirely rewritten to bring the discussion up to date in particular with respect to nonmilitary applications. There has been growing interest in the application of the techniques of operations research in industry and other nonmilitary operations. This is evidenced by the formation of a committee on operations research of the U S National Research Council and of an Operations Research Club in London and by the institution of classes in operations research in several American Universities. It is hoped that the present unclassified edition of Methods of Operations Research will be equally of interest and of use to industrial merchandising and nonmilitary governmental executives as the earlier classified edition seems to have been in military circles.
